Brief Lecture Description:

Europe has long been the root of secularism. It was where such an idea was born, triggered by the bloody war of religions. Nevertheless, this does not mean that religion is totally absent in the public spaces in Europe. Furthermore, globalization has made the national borders so permeable and transformed the world to be so diverse. Hence, the issue regarding the intersection between the state, law, and religion becomes so important than ever. How should religion be put under the framework of democracy, human rights, and rule of law in this modern world? This is the main question that will be discussed in this public lecture, especially under the context of religious Asian society using the European experience.
